Porky, Petunia, and Cicero were upset and angry. This time Bugs Bunny had simply gone too far! He had promised to be at Petunia's house promptly at nine o'clock to go skating with them. It was now after ten, and still he had not shown up, nor had he sent word to them.

"He must have overslept," said Petunia for the fifth time.

"He oversleeps EVERY time," fidgeted Cicero.

"L-Let's go t-tell him off," suggested Porky.

Slinging their skates over their shoulders, they started through the snow to Bugs's house.

"If h-he's still asleep, I'll—I'll—" threatened Porky.

"And so will I," agreed Petunia indignantly, not even waiting for Porky to finish his sentence.

Cicero said nothing, but just as they reached the entrance to Bugs's underground home, he swiftly scooped up a big handful of snow. Then he followed Porky and Petunia down the ladder into Bugs's house.

Someone was sleeping in Bugs's bed, all tucked in under the covers, except for his two long bunny ears. And the ears looked very much like Bugs Bunny's.

"Just as we thought," said Petunia. "Sound asleep! The lazybones!" She started toward the bed but Cicero beat her to it. Jerking back the covers, he tossed the wet, cold snow right in Bugs's face!

"Yeow!" screamed the bunny, leaping up in anger and surprise.

"Gosh," gasped Cicero, ducking behind Petunia. For the angry rabbit wasn't Bugs at all—he was a stranger!

"H-Heavenly d-days!" cried Porky. "Who are y-you?"

"Gracious!" exclaimed Petunia, pushing Cicero as far out of sight as she could.

"Who conked me?" the intruder shouted looking around wildly, unable to decide which of the three had heaved the snow at him.

"Porky!" screamed Petunia. "Grab him! Quick! Don't let him get away!"

Porky threw the blanket over the stranger. "G-Get the p-police!" he shouted.

Petunia was helping Porky hold the blanket tight over the head of the struggling intruder. For the first time in his life, Cicero took off up the ladder without having to be told twice.

"Oh, dear!" Petunia wailed. "Something terrible has happened to Bugs!"

"Maybe this v-villain k-killed him," said Porky, sitting astride the strange bunny's heaving shoulders.

In a few moments, Cicero returned with a big burly policeman, and before long the culprit was safely locked up in jail, blanket and all, in spite of his sputtered protests.

Then the police force and Bugs's friends turned to tracking down Bugs Bunny and bringing him back—alive.

they hoped.

Petunia, Porky, and Cicero visited all of Bugs's favorite haunts, but not a single clue to his whereabouts did they find.

"He m-must be dead," Porky finally choked. "B-Bugs would never let a s-stranger move into his house without p-putting up a f-fight."

Petunia looked thoughtful. "The house wasn't mussed up," she said.

"Maybe this stranger did Bugs in somewhere else," suggested Cicero. "An' left him in the snow to freeze an'—"

"Don't be so gruesome," Petunia interrupted.

Porky frowned. "B-But Cicero may be r-right. He—"

Again Petunia interrupted. "I don't think so," she said slowly. "I think there's some other explanation for all of this. Let's go back to Bugs's house. Maybe we'll pick up a clue we missed—"

Porky and Cicero looked skeptical but agreed to go with her.

Again they all climbed down the ladder into Bugs's home. Petunia glanced around and her eyes widened.

"Look!" she whispered, pointing toward the bed. There, sticking out from the covers, were two long bunny ears.

"The st-stranger!" gasped Porky. "He escaped!"

The ears came up and under them appeared the worried face of Bugs Bunny!

"What's the idea?" he asked, hopping out of bed. "And where's my Cousin Toughie?"

Petunia, Porky, and Cicero exchanged surprised and unhappy glances.

"C-Cousin Toughie?" Porky repeated stupidly.

"Yeah." Bugs looked more than a little puzzled. "I left him takin' a nap while I went out to find some skates for him. He said he'd like to go skatin' with us, and buy us all a big spread afterwards."

Petunia took a deep breath and hurriedly explained about Cousin Toughie's present predicament.

At the news that his cousin was in jail, Bugs leaped ten feet into the air. When he hit the floor again, he moaned loudly. "Omigosh! I'm ruined! Toughie'll REALLY mop me up!"

It took Porky and Petunia fifteen minutes to calm him. Then they decided they'd better hurry to the jail and tell the police sergeant the whole story.

Stifling a laugh, the sergeant sent word out over the police radio that Bugs had been found. Then he led the way to Toughie's cell.

"S-Sergeant," quavered Porky worriedly, as they neared the cell door, "perhaps y-you'd better explain the situation to him b-before you let him out. It m-might save some l-lives!"

Porky was right for Toughie was REALLY a tough bunny.

"Let me outa here!" he yelled, shaking the cell bars. "I'll show you what it means to toss ME in jail! I'll pin the ears back on all of you!"

However, when the sergeant told Toughie he would never get out unless he calmed down, Toughie promised to behave. "I guess it was just one o' those cases of mistaken identity they talk about," he said reasonably.

The sergeant unlocked the cell door. And half an hour later, Bugs, Porky, Petunia, Cicero, and Toughie were all skating on the pond. But Toughie had to live up to his reputation. They played crack-the-whip, and then he evened his score with the others. He was the "cracker" with Bugs next, then Porky, Petunia, and Cicero—on the very end. Toughie held tightly to Bugs's hand until they were skating round and round, very, very fast. Then he let go and all, except Toughie, went sprawling across the ice—and NOT on their skates!

After Toughie helped them to their feet again; he felt better. So he took them to the best hot dog stand in town and treated them to as many hot dogs as they could eat and as much hot chocolate as they could drink.

"Gosh!" said Cicero when he couldn't swallow another mouthful. "Toughie Bunny turned out to be a real sport! He can hand it out, but he can take it, too!"
